community of enamellers in the region, he decided in 1920 to devote part of his activity to artistic enamels. He hired Alexandre Marty, an experienced enameller, pupil and son-in-law of a renowned porcelain decorator, Alfred Draft. Their work consists of offering small flamed and frosted vases, stamped "Fauré Marty Limoges". Collections developed in the tone of what has been done for a few years in Limoges. In 1924, Fauré separates from Marty wishing to change clientele. it targets a high-end clientele made up of foreign buyers, specialized stores and Parisian establishments in the Faubourg Saint-Honoré. Camille Fauré hires five highly talented enamellers. He lets his workers work at their own pace, to create exceptional pieces marked by Art Deco. Until 1930, vases with geometric and cubist decorations burst onto the art market and seduced all of Paris. This is the fashion for enamels in relief. Their creators (Louis Valade, Lucie Dadat, Pierre Bardy and others...) will remain in the shadows while manufacturing vases which remain today as the most prestigious. From 1925, he met with great success at the Lyon Fair until 1930 when he was hit by the crisis. Faced with the crisis, Fauré decided once again to reorient his production, this time turning to a mass market, producing works at low prices with floral and naturalistic decoration. At the same time, he continues to edit vases from the previous period. The activity of Camille Fauré's workshop grew until the 1960s. About twenty workers produced numerous pieces for all budgets. Camille Fauré died in 1956 and his daughter Andrée took over, with her husband Louis. If vases with geometric decoration came back into fashion in the 1960s, the workshop closed its doors in 1985, despite numerous attempts to revive it by his son Gérard. Fashion has definitely changed. (See Proantic Magazine) Dimensions Diameter approx. 8 cm Height approx. 34 cm with ball glass height without glass 18 cm
